

Migration of Jharkhand's Oraon Tribes to Assam Tea Gardens: An Indian Issue of Equity and Justice

Professor Niranjan Sahoo

Xavier Institute of Social Service, Ranchi, INDIA

niranjansahoo@xiss.ac.in

Abstract

Examining how disruption can advance local innovation and economic structures that serve the common good, inspired by the call to global solidarity in Fratelli Tutti (2020). This paper explores these commitments as essential elements of responsible business and moral leadership in a disrupted world, emphasizing approaches that integrate purpose and social responsibility. This research paper has been developed on the Oraon tribes of Jharkhand to have an understanding on migrant laborers among the of Oraon community from Jharkhand to Hasimara block in West Bengal in search of permanent livelihood options during the colonial government. Doing research is not at all about giving the solutions without going into the fine details of the problem. One must collect the data in minute details of each step to which the research is related. This indicates that collection of data and use of appropriate method for the collection of data is the most vital step in the analysis of research work deeply. Some of the important methods applied in this research are observation, Interview, Case Study, Schedule, and Photography. It also includes author's idea developed by thinking about this situation deeply.